Jossey-Bass, 2010) "Because online readers tend to scan, a Web page or e-mail message should be visibly structured; it should have what [Jakob] Nielsen calls a 'scannable layout.' He found that frequent use of headings and bullets can increase readability by 47 percent. And since his study found that only about 10 percent of online readers scroll below the text initially visible on the screen, online writing should be 'fronted,' with the most important information placed at the beginning. Unless you have a good reason otherwise—as in a 'bad news' message, for example—structure your Web pages and e-mail messages like newspaper articles, with the most human face and personality of your business." You can be - conversational-enthusiastic-engaging- intimate (but not overly so)- informal. All of this is possible without stopping beyond the limits of what would be considered as the acceptable voice of the company. "However, other styles may be required owing to the nature of your business or your readership." Of the latter, as with other forms of online writing, it's important to know your reader and their expectations before you begin writing a blog. Butterworth-Heinemann, 2005) "Single sourcing describes the set of skills related to the conversion, updating, remediating, and reuse of content across multiple platforms, products, and media. . .
